

On the CUSP of change:

Effective scaling for social norms change programming for gender equality.

Community for Understanding Scale Up (CUSP)

Who we are?

Why we came together?

All of us have created initiatives that are now being scaled up

- Collectively we believe social norms change is key to address gender equality, including SRH&R and violence against women and girls

Our methodologies and initiatives are:

- being used by many other groups
- often included as recommended programming in large funding calls
- regularly being used in ways that they were not originally designed for

These experiences brought us together to consider our responsibility as developers of these initiatives to guide quality programming and responsible scale up.

Photo credit: Institute for Reproductive Health

Big Question

As a field, the big question:

- How do we go to scale? How do we reach more people with effective programming?

CUSP Working Group challenges:

- How can existing initiatives be effectively and responsibly scaled up?
- How can innovation be encouraged while maintaining the principles and elements of effective social norms approaches?

The context:

- Evidence base for programming to change social norms to achieve gender equality, including SRH&R and violence prevention, has grown
- Growing recognition that social norms change programming is critical

However:

- Emphasis on RCTs as the only valid way of measuring impact
- In scale up, numbers alone can come to dominate
- Numbers focus undermines human rights based approach to development: de-emphasis for politicized social justice work and increased focus on technocratic approaches
- And more often, existing programs being taken to scale, less innovation

As a field, we need to learn how to scale the aspects of programming that makes them effective: values and principles

Starting at the beginning: Why use a social norms change approach?

- Social norms are shared beliefs about what is typical and socially acceptable among a group of people
- Social norms shape and give order and meaning to our lives - they can be oppressive or freeing, confining or inclusive
- VAWG and gender inequality is sustained by norms that embody unequal gender power relations
- Shifting these norms rooted in power dynamics requires time and in-depth work to understand the social context
- The social norms change approach is inclusive and builds on community strengths as opposed to using negative messaging and instilling fear

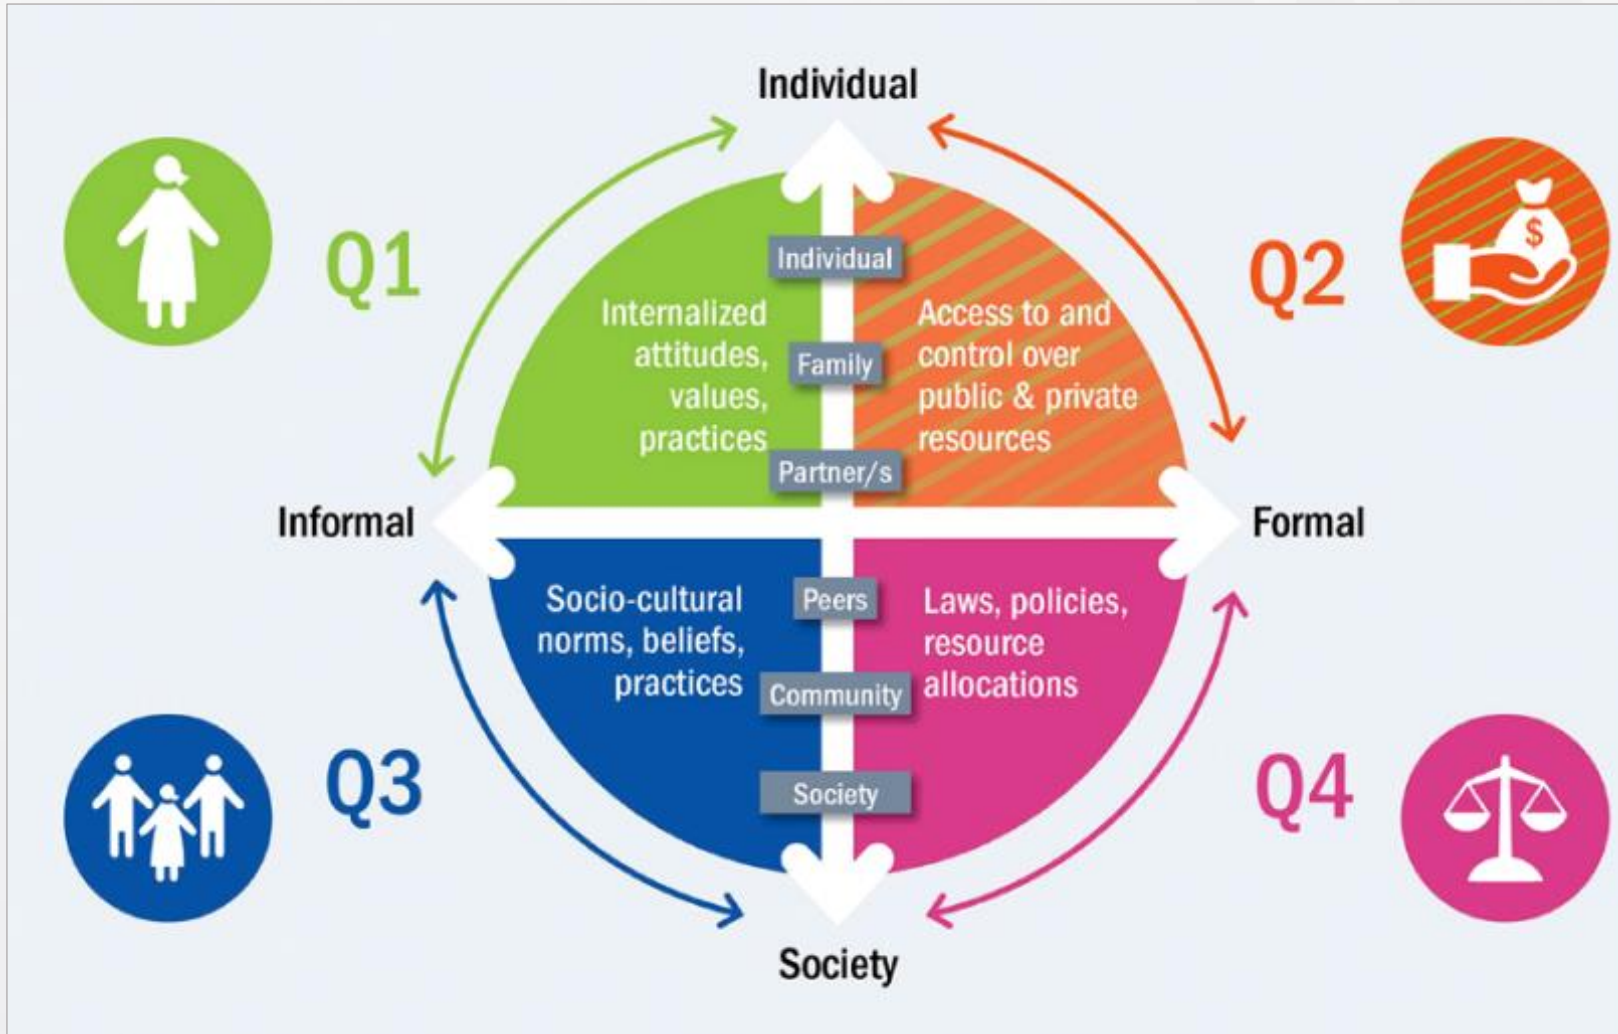

CUSP's approach to social norms change

- We strive to shift social norms through aspirational and strengths-oriented approaches
- Developing the capacity of all people in all their diversities
- Envisioning a collective future where hope is based on people's own lived and gendered experiences
- Supporting communities to develop social norms change from within
- Identifying and building on community strengths, critically examining harmful behaviour, supporting positive change

A photograph of a group of women, likely in a rural or community setting, with a semi-transparent blue overlay. The women are dressed in traditional Indian attire, including saris and shawls. One woman in the foreground is smiling broadly, while others in the background have various expressions. A white-bordered box is centered over the image, containing the text:

Working across a range of groups, perspectives and contexts to reach critical mass or the 'tipping point'

Social norms change theory and strategies need to address factors operating at multiple levels of inter-dependent complexities to create new beliefs and practices within a reference network.

This is when social change can happen.

Taking social norms change approaches to scale – no silver bullet

- Many groups recognize the need for sustained, holistic, integrated and multisectoral approaches to address complex problems
- However current models often
 - limit investment to evidence-based programs
 - are shortened, scaled down versions of evidence-based programs
 - include a mix and match of evidence-based programs
- This affects possibilities for both effective programming of existing approaches and innovation for new approaches

Scaling existing initiatives: key lessons

Sufficient time for NGOs to internalize a program
approach

Maintain fidelity to core principles

Create a strong foundation

Engage
program
developers

Think beyond numbers

Get personal

Adapt
and evolve

Support
innovation

Supporting innovation: scaling of principles

Do no harm

Work across the ecological model and change matrix

Use an intersectional, gender-power analysis

Ensure sustained commitment

Support theory and evidence-informed innovations

Promote personal and collective critical reflection

Support and invest in staff and community facilitators

Further reading

A call to action

CUSP's vision is for the scale up of social norms change programming to remain grounded in gendered, social justice principles both when taking existing programs to scale and embarking on new innovations.

We call for longer-term funding and planning, commitment to do no harm, a deeper investment in people, engagement with communities as equals with hope and optimism.

A vibrant mural on a wall, featuring a group of people in traditional clothing. The central figure is a woman in a white dress with circular patterns. To her left, a man in a green and yellow striped shirt is embracing her. To her right, another woman in a yellow dress with circular patterns is also embracing her. The background is a mix of blue and red, with several red handprints on the left side. On the right side of the mural, there is text in a stylized font. The text reads: "JOIN HANDS TO PREVENT DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AND HIV/AIDS IN MULAGO II".

JOIN US ON THE CUSP

JOIN HANDS TO PREVENT DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AND
HIV/AIDS
IN
MULAGO II